Not illustrated. 1904 Excerpt: . side of Exchange Place is a beautiful public garden with the Bajnotti Fountain in its centre and beyond this garden, extending the whole length, is the front of the new Union Passenger Station, not wholly beautiful perhaps, but admirably designed to meet the problems of its existence. These problems were many in the requirement of a double terminal and through station combined, that should provide for throngs of suburban travellers--who already average over twenty-five thousand a day--and separate them from the passengers of the through trains and give easy access to all of its tracks without crossing any others, as well as such provision for streets to pass through that the city might not be cut in two. As a result of many years of rival plans the final decision has resulted in a structure that many experts call the best operating station in the country. In the rear of the station three large tracts of weed-covered land had been left over after filling in the last remaining basin of the old Cove, which once covered nearly all of the central section of the city. There were those who would have been glad to sell them for any of those business enterprises that generally huddle disfiguringly under the shadow of great American railway stations, but the City Council in the summer of 1904 has definitely dedicated them for park purposes. Their position is of great importance. Beyond is the gentle eminence of Capitol Hill. To...
