Excerpt: . . . position of two circles, etc. But at the same time the consideration of the relations thus arising, which can be arranged in many different ways according to the point of view, furnishes an excellent means for schooling the logical thought, a means to be used to the fullest extent; so also the discussion of transitional cases and the working out of the notion of limit. To permit this exercise many details of the previous work are to be omitted, many things to be touched upon only lightly; especially is the extension of theorems proved for rational relations to the case of irrationality to be treated from the practical standpoint exclusively, i. e. with reference to the possibility of diminishing at pleasure the error arising from the substitution of rational numbers for the irrational. Problems of construction are to be dealt with only in close connection with the course of study; in the so-called analysis especial regard is to be had to the train of thought by which one really arrives at the solution, i. e. the analysis is to be treated, so to speak, psychologically; especial stress is to be laid on the rapid development of the functional way of thinking (where again the limiting cases are to be discussed first and foremost). Further in these classes a road is to be broken for a combination of arithmetical and constructive mathematics, partly by the first introduction into graphic representation, partly by the practical verification of...
