Christopher Addison in the House of Commons, June 2f, 1917. The Labour tiaiette, London, July, 1917, p. 237. These orders were not responsible for all tlio overtime work which went on. For a time an impression prevailed that the factory restrictions had been laid aside altogether, and certain employers either worked overtime without securing permits, or else, having secured a special order, exceeded the exemptions allowed by it. Instances are given in which, when the factory inspectors brought suit against such offenders, the magistrates refused to inflict any penalty, on the ground that the public welfare would he injured by any interference with production.2 In September, 1916, the Ministry of Munitions appointed a special committee to look into the whole question of the health of munition workers and to report as to what action was needed. This committee issued a series of reports, dealing with...
